WASHINGTON STATE UNIVERSITY

Mike Trevisan

Mike Trevisan, Ph.D., was appointed dean of WSU's College of Education on April 3, 2013.

He was previously associate dean for research and external funding, as well as the director of the university's Learning and Performance Research Center.

Dr. Trevisan is a professor of educational psychology.

We continue to seek out and reward excellence through scholarships and research funding; private program support allows us to create an environment that encourages inquiry-based learning. Research in the College of Education continues to focus on national areas of interest such as science and math education while also addressing the unique needs of Washington state. We have substantial research occurring in topics related to English Language Learning as well as assessment and evaluation. All of our faculty members are committed to preparing our students to become educational leaders for a diverse society in whichever degree program they choose.

Your support of the College of Education through the Dean's Excellence Fund not only awards scholarships, but helps pave the way for research, enhance faculty collaboration, supports diverse learning, and sets the pace for theory and practice in STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering, Mathematics) education. We reach out to the elementary and secondary schools all across Washington to improve the quality of math and science programs in particular, in hopes of starting students on the right foot academically and shaping the economic future of Washington.

As we continue to meet the needs of schools and communities through our work with future teachers, administrators, counselors, and sport specialists our faculty are simultaneously creating new knowledge through research-providing the big idea of education.
